1) Suppose someone designed a stack abstract data type in which the function top returned an access path (or pointer) rather than returning a copy of the top element. This is not a true data abstraction. Why? Give an example that illustrates the problem.

2) Explain why allowing a class to implement multiple interfaces in Java does not create the same problems that multiple inheritance in C++ creates.